Smiths fit, next the cutlers and gunsmiths and finally the entire trade of the town was under attack. These bands of marauders varied in number from fifty to nearly one thousand, and contain a considerable proportion of women and children. They seemed to have no sort of organization, nor any definite object in view. At first they rushed simultaneously into the bakers' shops, twenty or thirty of which were stormed and plundered. They also demanded and received money from various other storekeepers. An attack was made on St. John's Market, but the gates were closed, and the police beat off the brawlers. Towards evening the town resumed its wonted appearance. An extra force of special constables and a number of the ordinary the proportionate number in the neighborhood. Notice has been given to day laborers that they are not to be employed until the strike is delayed. Numbers of the needle-makers are adding are without work. The watch trade is suffering from the same cause. The clothing stores are receiving orders. In most of the other manufacturing towns and villages of the district, the measure of pauperism was on a different temperature. There were no operations in the clothing trade in the Nottingham lace and hosiery trade was not in operation. The business is beginning to recover from scarcity of employment and dearth of provisions.

At Leicester business remained so depressed that a number of hands were out of work. At Leeds and in the West Riding of Yorkshire distress exists, but it is hoped only of a temporary nature.
